Title: War and peace, violence and truce: the preaching of the friars and the aspiration to social order in Umbria and the Marches (15th century)

Offer description - Funded by the European Union – Next Generation EU – PNRR mission 4, component 2, investment 1.1

The research is aimed to study, both on edited and unpublished sources, specific cases of interaction between three parties involved (the people and the elites, the representatives of political power, the friars in the pulpit) in the attempt to calm the forms of violence (civil, private, factional) that scarred municipal life. While the theme is well delineated in broad outlines by even the most recent historiography, for Umbria and the Marches there are several cases to be studied with an overabundance of literary sources (sermons and chronicles). Given the various meanings that the terms treuga and pax assume (de facto or de jure) in the medieval centuries, the subject of this research illuminates perhaps improper but very indicative meanings. Furthermore, if the 'truce' is temporary in itself, it is useful to highlight the devices for protecting peace and the fragility of the arrangements and effects achieved.
